Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, the National Consumer Law Center thanks the committee for providing the opportunity to submit comments today regarding the devastating impact that passage of S. 650 would have on our low-income clients.

The National Consumer Law Center is a nonprofit organization specializing in consumer credit issues. We work with thousands of attorneys around the country, representing low-income and elderly homeowners, who request our assistance with the analysis of credit transactions to determine appropriate claims and defenses their clients might have.¹ As a result of our daily contact with these practicing attorneys we have seen examples of predatory home equity loans from almost every state in the union.² Without a doubt, passage of S. 650 in its current form would allow that sector of the lending industry which engages in abusive and unconscionable practices to grow and thrive. The positive effects of the good work that Chairman D'Amato did in the last Congress through his sponsorship of the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act would be completely outweighed by the effects of the deregulation resulting from S. 650.

These comments have four parts:

• Part 1 deals generally with the most dangerous aspects of S. 650, those cast as a response to the Rodash case (sections 113 through 120 of the bill).

¹The National Consumer Law Center, Inc. (NCLC) is a nonprofit Massachusetts corporation founded in 1969 at Boston College School of Law and dedicated to the interests of low-income consumers. NCLC provides legal and technical consulting and assistance on consumer law issues to legal services, government and private attorneys across the country. Usury and Consumer Credit Regulation (NCLC 1991) and Unfair and Deceptive Acts and Practices (NCLC 1991), two of eleven practice treatises published by NCLC, and our newsletter, NCLC Reports Consumer Credit & Usury Ed., describe the law currently applicable to home equity loan transactions.

²Some examples of the types of outrageous practices we have seen may be found in NCLC publications, such as Hobbs, Keest, DeWaal, "Consumer Problems with Home Equity Scams, Second Mortgages, and Home Equity Lines of Credit," (AARP 1989); Keest, "Second Mortgage Lending: Abuses and Regulation," (NCLC, for Rockefeller Family Fund, 1991); "Nature Abhors a Vacuum: High-rate Lending in Redlined, Minority Neighborhoods in Boston," and "Principal Padding: The Prepaid Payment Pyramid," 9 NCLC Reports Consumer Credit & Usury Ed. (May/June 1991).
Part 2 is a section by section analysis of Sections 101 through 120, which have the greatest impact on our clients by amending the Truth in Lending Act and the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act.

Part 3 outlines a proposed solution to the lender requests for relief from Rodash type actions as well as lender complaints about regulatory burden. These solutions will not only reduce regulatory burden, streamline and ease regulatory compliance requirements in the home loan process, but also provide better disclosures for homeowners.

Part 4 includes a number of true case histories from low-income homeowners which illustrate the importance of maintaining the minimal protections that are in current law.

Part 1

S. 650 Goes Too Far - It Eviscerates The Truth in Lending Act

Although the stated purposes of S. 650 are to "increase the amount of credit available . . . ." Instead this bill essentially guts the Truth in Lending Act. Among a variety of amendments, two massive proposals stand out - either one of which would reduce Truth in Lending to a meaningless law for homeowners:

• The right of rescission for all loans secured by first liens which refinance prior extensions of credit would be eliminated. This would leave homeowners without the opportunity to escape from misleading and unfair home loans. (Sec. 114 of S. 650.)

• A change in the rules governing assignee liability which would make it virtually impossible to hold assignees liable for disclosure violations. As most home loans are assigned, this change would leave most homeowners without any remedy. Moreover, it removes all market incentives for ensuring compliance with the law. (Sec. 118 of S. 650.)

Other amendments that S. 650 would make to the Truth in Lending Act (not one of which would benefit consumers) include:

• A "tolerance" in the finance charge disclosure, equal to $100 would be allowed. The effect of this would be that the creditors could deliberately fail to include up to a hundred dollars of 3Other than those covered by the 1994 Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act, called "high cost mortgages" by many in the industry. It should be noted that this exemption would not protect the vast majority of loans made on the marketplace, including a substantial portion of abusive loans.

charges in the disclosure of finance charge, without violating TILA - when the essential purpose of TILA is to require the exact disclosure of the cost of credit. (Sec. 115 of S. 650.)

• A total limitation of liability for damages or rescission for many mortgages loans already made. (Sec. 116 of S. 650.)

• A prohibition on the equitable extension of the rescission period beyond three years, which courts have used as a method of last resort to provide relief -- as a defense to a foreclosure -- in a very few abusive loan situations. (Sec. 117 of S. 650.)

• The Federal Reserve Board would be allowed to waive or modify the right of rescission without any guidelines limiting those reductions in the important right of rescission to instances where it would benefit consumers. (Sec. 120 of S. 650.)

Background

Most of Part II of S. 650 is a response to the decision in the recently decided case of Rodash v. AIB Mortgage Co. In Rodash, after the consumer-plaintiff was forced into foreclosure because her loan required payments in excess of her income, she rescinded based on the lender's violations of Truth in Lending. The appellate court upheld the rescission, saying:

The burdens imposed on creditors are minimal, especially when compared to the harms that are avoided. The appellee's actions in this case disregarded that policy.

The reaction of the mortgage banking industry to this decision was to implore Congress to retroactively change Truth in Lending, despite the fact that the law has been clear on these points all along.

A Deal that is No Longer a Deal

The mortgage banking industry first went to Congress requesting emergency relief from the effects of the Rodash decision in the fall of 1994. After extensive negotiations with representatives of consumers, an amendment was attached to the bill amending the Fair Credit Reporting Act. This amendment gave the industry the relief it sought - protection, even retroactively, from law suits alleging violations of TILA found to be illegal by the Rodash court. The amendment also changed the law prospectively to ensure that lenders would know how to make disclosures on these charges, without risking legal exposure in the future.

The amendment drafted in late 1994 failed to pass Congress because the bill to which it was attached hit a snag in the Senate. Yet, the mortgage industry lobbied forcefully for its passage - because the amendment addressed every one of the industry concerns raised by the Rodash case.

Unlike the 1994 amendments, Part II of S. 650 does not just respond to lender concerns raised by Rodash - it goes much further.

Bankers Need A "Tolerance" For Adding Up Money?

Current regulations allow a $10 tolerance on the finance charge; in other words, a creditor can avoid liability for an inaccurate disclosure of the finance charge if the inaccuracy is no greater than $10. S. 650 would allow mortgage lenders to fail to include in the finance charge - a crucial disclosure of the cost of credit under TILA - as much as one hundred dollars of charges. Mistakes in arithmetic are already forgiven by TILA.

Sec. 115 of S. 650 would allow deliberately hidden charges.

TILA requires the disclosure of numbers which reveal the various components of the cost of credit, including the "amount financed" and the "finance charge." Each of these disclosures are determined by combining a sum of a series of independent numbers. It is the appropriate arithmetical amalgamation of these numbers that TILA requires. To say that one number is less important because it is only one number among many, misses the point of the strict rules of disclosure created by the Truth in Lending law. It is precisely the strict requirement that each number be specifically disclosed that makes the TILA required disclosures helpful at all to consumers. With S. 650, lenders would be able to call their charges to consumers something they are not.

To put Sec. 115 of S. 650 in perspective, consider whether bankers have tolerances of hundreds of dollars when disclosing profits and losses to the IRS? Or to their stockholders? Or to their correspondent banks? Consider whether borrowers have a tolerance in the forgiveness of the debt equal to the tolerance allowed the creditor in disclosing the costs of the debt?

The purpose of TILA is to require the disclosure of the cost of credit. Tolerances in these disclosures beyond a few dollars vitiate the whole purpose of the Act. If this provision were allowed to pass the Congress, TILA would no longer provide meaningful disclosures of the cost of credit to many homeowners.

7§130(c) of TILA exempts creditors from liability for errors (even beyond the current $10 tolerance) resulting from clerical, calculation, computer malfunction and programming, and printing errors.
The Right of Rescission - The Last Line of Defense For Homeowners

In 1968, just as in 1995, Congress had been alerted to the significant risk of losing the family home due to ill-considered or overreaching home equity lending. The stories in 1968 were the same as the stories in 1995, which is why Congress enacted a cooling off period to allow consumers to think about the risk of borrowing on their home, in the quiet of their living room, away from the sales pressure, and with full and accurate information about the cost of the step they were about to take. The right to rescind is extended beyond three days only if the lender does not give full and accurate information about one or more of the 6 pieces of information Congress deemed the most critical. Even then, that right is cut off at three years. When a consumer exercises that right, the security interest is canceled, the lender cannot keep finance charges or costs, and the borrower must tender the loan's real proceeds back to the lender.

Compliance is Enforced Through Deterrence. The right to rescind the loan is necessary to deter non-compliance with the crucial requirements of the TILA law. It is also TILA that keeps competitive forces at work, as the most efficient lenders can disclose the lowest cost, and attract more consumers. It is those honest, efficient lenders who will lose when higher cost, inefficient lenders can wrongly disclose lower costs without fear of any significant consequences.

The Deterrence Provided by the Possibility of Rescission Works. There is no doubt that the vast majority of lenders who make home loans in the United States have never been subject to a TILA rescission. This is because on most loans, made by most home lenders, there are no TILA violations. This shows that TILA is working. Lenders are properly disclosing all of the costs of credit in almost all cases. Most lenders are sufficiently concerned with the threat of rescission that they ensure that their loans are not subject to it, they properly make TILA disclosures. If the remedy of rescission is removed, so is the impetus for compliance with TILA.

The Right of Rescission Provides Some Balance in the Deregulated Marketplace. It has been recognized since biblical times that borrowers need some protection from overreaching lenders. Borrowers are often desperate to obtain what only the lender can provide - immediate money. For centuries, this vast difference in bargaining power has been the reason for the close regulation of 8Not all home-secured loans are rescindable. Only non-purchase money loans secured by the borrower's principal dwelling are.

9Finance charge, amount financed, APR, total of payments, payment schedule, and notice of right of cancellation.

10Common law recoupment allows defendants in civil actions to raise claims they have against a plaintiff as a defense, even if the statute of limitations has run on that statute.

11Banks understand the logic of deterrence. They justify charging $25 for late payments or bounced checks that cost them only $1 to 2 dollars in order to deter consumers from making late payments or bouncing checks.
consumer credit. However, in 1980, Congress prohibited states from imposing caps or ceilings on loans secured by first liens on homes. In 1982, Congress extended this prohibition of consumer protections by outlawing the limitation on terms and conditions of these loans secured by first liens on homes. The justification for this deregulation was the strict requirement of disclosure of all the costs and terms of the credit. The rationale was that as long as full and fair disclosure is required, the market will police itself. Thus, deregulation of home lending was premised on the strict enforcement of the disclosure rules in TILA.

S. 650 Would Leave Homeowners Obtaining Already Deregulated Loans With No Protections. Sec. 114 of S. 650 proposes to exempt the same loans which are already deregulated as to rates and terms from the only remaining protections borrowers have - the right to full and accurate information about loan terms, and rescission if these disclosures are not made.

As was recognized by the 103rd Congress with the passage of the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act, many older Americans and many minority Americans have been the victims of an industry that has developed in the vacuum created by the lack of regulation of home loans. The complete absence of caps on the interest rates and fees that lenders can charge on many of these loans, as well as the dramatic increases in home values over the last decade, has led to the development of an entire industry which targets less sophisticated homeowners and engages them in high priced and unfair loan practices. High interest rates and other abusive loan terms are typical. Consumers are often coaxed into signing loans for which there is no reasonable probability that they will be able to repay.

In many elderly, minority, or low-income neighborhoods, the number of houses sold at foreclosure have skyrocketed due to these abusive loans. With the significant exception of TILA rescission, most state and federal laws are generally inapplicable to these loans. Despite the rampant unfairness of many of these loans, there is often only one way to save the home from foreclosure - rescind for a TILA disclosure violation.

The right of rescission is the only tool left under state or federal laws generally available to save homes from foreclosure due to abusive loan terms. Cutting back on its use will leave homeowners generally with no protection whatsoever from overreaching lenders, and with no way to save their homes.

12 Congress' contribution to this problem can be traced to the passage of 1) the Depository Institutions Deregulation and Monetary Control Act of 1980, §501 (often referred to as "DIDMCA"), codified at 12 U.S.C. §1735f-7a, which preempted state usury ceilings on mortgage lending secured by first liens (whether purchase money or not); and 2) the passage of the Alternative Mortgage Transaction Parity Act of 1982 (often referred to as "AMTPA"), 12 U.S.C. §3800, et seq., which preempted state limitations on risky "creative financing" options, such as negative amortization loans, or balloon notes.

13 It was widely recognized during the congressional discussions of the Home Ownership and Protection Act of 1994 that this Act alone will not address all of the abusive home lending.
Part 2

Section by Section analysis of S. 650 as it Affects Low-Income Consumers

Sec. 101.
Coordination of the Truth in Lending Act and the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act

 Generally, there is no problem with requiring that these two laws be coordinated, however there are a number of problems with the specific provisions of this section. First, there is no requirement that disclosures be made in the most informative and helpful manner for consumers. Second, (on page 5, line 17) there is a specific prohibition against new disclosures, so that the only way the Federal Reserve Board would be permitted to "coordinate" the two laws would be to eliminate some of the existing disclosure requirements. Instead, more appropriately, there should be an instruction for new, consistent and coordinated disclosures to be made under both laws. [In fact, our proposal outlined in Part 3 of this testimony, does just that - sets out amendments to the Truth in Lending Act and RESPA which will eliminate much of the duplication between the two laws, simplifies the lenders' requirements, and improves the quality of the information provided to the consumer.]

The other major change implemented by this section would be to shift regulatory authority of RESPA from HUD to the Federal Reserve Board. This probably goes too far. RESPA has both disclosure requirements and substantive requirements (regarding escrow accounts and unfair acts during settlement). It makes much more sense to shift the regulatory authority over disclosures to the Federal Reserve Board, while leaving the substantive regulations within HUD's bailiwick.

Sec. 102.
Elimination of Redundant Regulators

In addition to making clarifying changes to RESPA regarding the change in regulatory authority from HUD to the Board, this section sets out the specifications which the Board is instructed to use regarding these disclosure requirements. Conspicuously absent from the specifications is any language requiring the regulations to ensure or facilitate helpful and timely disclosures to be made to consumers.

This section further deals with enforcement of compliance. The addition of the language in section (d) giving the Federal Trade Commission enforcement authority is good, however, there would still be no private right of action for the failure to make required RESPA disclosures.

Sec. 103. General Exemption Authority for Loans

This section requires the Board to exempt some transactions from TILA coverage altogether. The section is unnecessary, and clearly not written for the benefit of consumers. The Board already has authority to exempt classes of transactions which "in the judgment of the Board are necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of this title, to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof, or to facilitate compliance therewith." (Section 105 of TILA.)

Conspicuously absent from the list of factors the Board is instructed to use to determine which classes of transactions to exempt are any that relate to the protection of the borrowing public, or the importance of maintaining and strengthening homeownership. Further, the factors that are listed are unclear in the intent and their effect. For example, the first factor mentions small loans. Does this imply that on small loans TILA disclosures and protections would not be necessary? Yet those are exactly the types of loans which low-income borrowers are most likely to obtain, and which are already rife with abuses. Should the Georgia citizens who borrowed $600 and $581 not be told theirs were 57.64% and 58.11% loans, respectively? Should the Utah customers at a local finance company not be told the company charges anywhere from 280% to 420% for loans of $100 to $200? Should South Carolina borrowers not be told that loans of less than $150 can cost more than 100%?14

Sec. 104. Reductions in Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act Regulatory Burdens

Among the changes that would be made in this section is the repeal of the RESPA coverage of loans secured by subordinate liens. There are two issues with this proposal. The most serious problem is that the prohibition against kickbacks to loan brokers would be repealed for junior lien loans. There is no justification for such a repeal. This anti-kickback provision is one of the few federal substantive consumer laws that provide real protection to consumers. Repealing this protection would encourage the growth of reverse incentives in the mortgage broker industry. Without a prohibition against kickbacks by a lender to a broker, market forces reward the brokers who refer borrowers to the most expensive lenders, rather than the cheapest.

14These rates are not fictional; they are real life examples from NCLC files, and the files of the attorneys who work directly with these borrowers. See also Paul Tosto, "Alternative banks often profit from the poor," The State, p. 1A (Dec. 26, 1993).
Secondly, assuming the disclosures required by RESPA provide valuable information to borrowers who are providing their homes as security for a loan, there is no justification for not providing the same disclosures for junior lien loans. [See our proposal in Section 3 below regarding a method of making RESPA disclosures and TILA disclosures more streamlined and more helpful to consumers.]

Sec. 111. Exemption for Certain Borrowers

This proposal (called the sophisticated borrower exemption) is deplorable. This section would exempt from TILA coverage all credit transactions involving consumers with annual incomes over $200,000 or having assets over $1,000,000. As advocates exclusively for low-income consumers, we find this proposal very scary. Once the U.S. Congress starts passing different consumer protection laws based on the wealth of the consumer, it is not hard to imagine the day when the poor are accorded less protection, because of their poverty. It is also very difficult to see how this proposal will benefit the lenders, as with it they would have to prepare two different sets of disclosure documents. Also, we all should remember that while $200,000 may seem a generous annual income in 1995, in fifteen years or so, this figure may fall squarely among the average earned income for very middle class families.

Sec. 112. Alternative Disclosures for Adjustable Rate Mortgages

This section provides the lender with an alternative to the current disclosures required for adjustable rate mortgages in both the open end and closed end credit sections of TILA. The alternative disclosure is simply a sentence that says the monthly payment may increase or decrease. This alternative information is of minimal use to the consumer. Of far more benefit to the consumer would be the requirement that the lender disclose the maximum possible payment under the loan. Assuming the borrower draws the maximum allowed from the credit line, and the interest rates goes to highest level, information about the resulting payment would be of far more value to the consumer than either the current disclosures or the new sentence proposed by S. 650.

Sec. 113. Treatment of Certain Charges

This is the first of the "Rodash fixes." This section would ensure the exclusion of three types of charges from the finance charge: charges imposed by third party closing agents, intangible tax fees, and loan document preparation fees. We only have a comment on the first proposal.

The proposed language would exclude from the finance charge fees imposed by third party closing agents if the creditor does not expressly require the imposition of the charge and does not retain the charge and has not required the use of the third party imposing the charge.\footnote{For example, it is the lender who chooses to require that third-party closing agents be used -- inserting another layer of middlemen into the loan origination process. While they may offer the borrowers a choice from among an approved list, the creditor requires that a third party be used. Moreover, it selects who goes on the list from which the borrower may "choose." Thus it is the creditor who has the choice to compete on costs by eliminating the middleman entirely. Or, if it chooses to insert the middlemen, at least it would have an incentive to monitor those middlemen to ensure that the ones who do the job efficiently and cheaply are the ones who make the list. Without such a requirement, once again, reverse competition can prevail, for the more expensive the middleman, the more the lender can learn in interest on an increased loan balance.} We would recommend adding the requirements that the creditor:

1) has no control over the imposition of the charge;
2) has not required the service inducing the charge;
3) has no reasonable way of knowing the amount of charge at the time the disclosures are prepared;
4) has not required the use of the third party imposing the charge; and
5) is not related to or affiliated with the third party.

Adding the requirement that the creditor does not require the particular service for which the agent is charging the borrower tracks the recently published change to the Commentary regarding what should be excluded from the finance charge by the Board. (See 63 Federal Register 16777, April 3, 1995.) [Also see Part 3 of this testimony regarding our proposal to include all charges in the finance charge except those charges imposed by third party closing agents meeting the above criteria.]

Further, to ensure that only \textit{de minimus} charges are excluded from the finance charge in this way, we propose that the total amount to be excluded from the finance charge because of third party imposed charges be limited to $100.

Sec. 114. \textbf{Exemptions from Rescission}

As stated above, this proposal would eliminate the right of rescission for all loans secured by first liens which refinance prior extensions of credit. This would leave homeowners without the opportunity to escape from misleading and unfair home loans.

This exemption would not include those loans covered by the 1994 Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act, called "high cost mortgages" by many in the industry. By no means would this exception from the proposed exemption protect homeowners from abusive loans. There are still tens of thousands of loans on the marketplace which are not caught within the high trigger requirements of the high costs mortgage law, for which homeowners should have the right of rescission. Indeed, the effect of this proposal would leave the vast majority of loans made on the marketplace, including a substantial portion of abusive loans without virtually the only protections homeowners now have from deceptive home loans.

As this proposal has gained notoriety, homeowners of all income levels have come forward with stories of necessary uses of the right of rescission - within the original three days - and afterwards. Homeowners need the right of rescission not only in the archetypal "abusive" home loan setting, but often also when dealing with a reputable lender. All too frequently, homeowners have found when they get to closing that the terms or rates on the loans they are being asked to sign are different than those to which they had agreed. Often, because of the dozens of pieces of paper which are placed before them in rapid succession for their signature, they do not appreciate the full extent of the discrepancies between what they had agreed to in the application process and what they signed at closing.

The extra time to digest the ramifications of all the terms, the rates, and the fees, agreed to in a home loan, provided by the three day right of rescission is an essential protection to homeowners. It is especially important in light of the fact that there are virtually no other limits on the rates and terms required in these loans. (See full discussion of the importance of the right of rescission in Part 1 of this testimony.)

Sec. 115. Tolerances; Basis for Disclosures

Taking the second part of the proposed change in this section first - the basis for disclosure for per diem interest - we have no objection.

This is not the case with the first proposed change. This section provides that lenders can have a tolerance of $100 in their disclosure of the finance charge. The effect of this would be that as much as $100 in fees and charges could be hidden from consumers. There is no justification for this.

Lenders say they need clarity on what charges should be included in the finance charge, and that the penalties for making a mistake on a small charge is too great, and unfair to lenders. This debate should be held in the context that it was the lenders who have always lobbied for the various exclusions from the finance charge, thus leading to the confusion that may exist today.

The best response we can provide is to recommend that from henceforward everything that the consumer must pay due to the fact that a loan is being obtained must be included in the finance charge. The only exclusions should possibly be those small charges imposed by the third party closing agent over which the lender has no control, and from which the lender receives no benefit. Our proposal to deal with this problem, as well as the coordination of RESPA disclosures with TILA disclosures is set out in Part 3 of this testimony.
Sec. 116. Certain Limitations on Liability

These retroactive exclusions from liability would excuse lenders on virtually all outstanding loans. In fact, these exclusions from liability far exceed even the prospective changes proposed by the bill. This proposal essentially asks the United States Congress to insert itself into disputes currently waging in the courts on the appropriate penalties that lenders should pay for their continued and systematic violations of clear and unambiguous provisions of TILA. This is all proposed under the guise of the necessity to protect lenders from liability of the Rodash case progeny. Yet, the proposal goes far beyond anything determined by the Rodash court.

Not only would the lenders be excused from liability in class actions, but also for all individual actions filed. Specifically, the proposal in Sec. 139 would exempt from liability lenders who failed to disclose properly:

- The fee for the intangible tax which was disputed in the Rodash case. (Sec. 139(a)(1)(A).) This retroactive exclusion does correspond to a prospective change in the law. It also corresponds to the Federal Reserve Board's treatment of these fees in its Commentary. (See Commentary §226.4(7)(D), 63 Federal Register 16777. April 3, 1995.)

- Fees for preparation of deeds, settlement statements, or other documents, or appraisals. (Sec.139(a)(1)(B).) This proposed exclusion is absurd. These fees are already specifically excluded from the finance charge in the Truth in Lending Act, and have been for many years. Lenders who have deliberately ignored the law are now trying to avoid liability for their behavior in flagrant violation of the law. They cannot claim that their actions were a mistake, or else they would not need this retroactive protection from liability. Lenders are already provided with protection from liability for bona fide or accidental errors. (TILA §130(c).)

- Fees for charges imposed by third party closing agents. (Sec. 139(a)(1)(B).) This retroactive exclusion does correspond to a prospective change in the law.

- As much as $100 in fees which were improperly excluded from the finance charge. (Sec.139(b)(1)(A).) This retroactive exclusion does correspond to a prospective change in the law. But the effect of this proposal would be to cut out virtually the only method that victims of abusive home loans have to save their homes from foreclosure.

- Fees which are greater than those required to be disclosed. (Sec. 139(b)(1)(B).)
Sec. 117. Limitation on Rescission Period

This section would stop a practice in which the courts have used their equitable powers to extend the right of rescission beyond the statutorily permitted three years, when rescission is raised as a method of recoupment in a foreclosure.\(^\text{16}\) The limited use by the courts of this equitable remedy has provided one of the few methods courts have to help balance the interests between lenders and homeowners who stand to lose their homes because of abusive loan terms. It is rarely used, but of crucial importance when it is used.

The reported cases in which this right has been exercised are few. However, one case from Colorado reveals why the change proposed in this section would work an injustice for homeowners. In Dawes v. Merchants Mortgage and Trust Corp.,\(^\text{17}\) the borrowers, Mr. and Mrs. Dawes, did not receive a proper notice of their right to rescind their transaction, something agreed upon by all parties. They also stopped making payments after nearly a year when it became obvious that improvements promised by the creditor would not be completed. But then nothing happened for more than four years, when suit was filed on the note by Merchants, a bank which had obtained the note by assignment. Two years later, the Dawes notified the plaintiff of their intention to rescind in the nature of recoupment.

The Colorado Supreme Court permitted the rescission by recoupment after that claim had been denied as a matter of law by the lower courts. It held that if the rescission claims were barred by reason of the statute of limitations the lenders could avoid the penalties intended by the Truth in Lending Act and profit from its violations simply by waiting three years before bringing suit. For the same reasons, this proposal should not pass.

Sec. 118 Assignee Liability.

Changing the statute by omitting just a few words, this provision would virtually eliminate all assignee liability for TILA violations. As almost all home loans (as well as car loans) are assigned, the effect of the elimination of assignee liability would be to make it impossible to challenge improper disclosures, or even raise those violations of this disclosure law as a defense to a foreclosure or other action to collect on a debt.

\(^{16}\)It has long been recognized in common law that there is a right to assert a claim defensively which would be barred if asserted affirmatively. Otherwise it would be manifestly unfair to allow one party to demand performance on a contract to which the other party has a valid defense. Without this common law protection to assert rights by way of defense, the parties to a contract would be unevenly protected by the laws which enforce the rights and obligations under the contract. See, e.g. Bull v. U.S., 295 U.S. 247, 262 (1935).

\(^{17}\) 683 P.2d 796 (Colo.1984).
It should be noted that this section affects all consumer credit, not just credit secured by the home.

There should be no misunderstanding regarding the impact of this proposal. Its passage would dispatch the Truth in Lending Act to the wayside in terms of consumer protection laws. As it would no longer be enforceable in the majority of consumer loans, it would doubtfully be complied with in many instances.

This section also would clarify that the servicer of a loan would not be treated as an assignee. There is no problem with this concept, so long as the servicer were required to provide the consumer with the name and address of the assignee or owner of the loan.

Sec. 119  Modification of Waiver of Right of Rescission

This section would provide the Federal Reserve Board unlimited authority to modify or waive all the crucial rights created under the section establishing the right to rescind certain home loans. Currently the Board's authority in this regard is limited to when it finds such action necessary for homeowners to meet bona fide emergencies. The proposal has no standards whatsoever for the Board to use in exercising this serious limitation on consumers' rights. There is no justification for such a broad exercise of uncontrolled discretion regarding this essential right to be delegated by Congress.

Sec. 120  Applicability

Unlike other laws amending the Truth in Lending Act, which always require the implementation of regulations before making the law effective, this provision would make all changes effective immediately following ratification.

Part 3

Proposed Resolution to the Issues Raised by S. 650
There are two issues raised by the proposed changes to the Truth in Lending Act and RESPA in S. 650: prospective changes to TILA (and RESPA), and some response to the lending industry's cries that the secondary market is going to collapse under the weight of Rodash actions.

We offer a proposal regarding the simplification of the disclosure requirements under TILA and RESPA. Regarding retroactive relief which would cut off existing consumer rights under existing law, we urge extreme caution. At a minimum all individual actions for violations of existing law should not be compromised. Further, to the extent that liability under class actions is limited, it should be only for those violations that Congress is certain are so de minimus that the equities truly lay with the lenders.

Regarding the prospective changes in the laws, generally we propose to change the definition of finance charge to include everything related to the cost of credit. This makes compliance very easy for creditors, and it places all lenders on a level playing field. It thus strengthens the role that competition can play in the marketplace, to the advantage of efficient lenders. The finance charge would be itemized in all transactions secured by a principal dwelling. RESPA disclosures would be dropped altogether. In their stead, lenders would be required to provide a good faith estimate of the finance charge, itemized, as well as the amount financed, also itemized.

More specifically, the finance charge would be disclosed as one figure, under which two separate disclosures would also be made: the finance charge to be paid during the term of the loan (which would include interest, mortgage insurance premiums, etc.), and prepaid finance charges (which would include settlement charges - individually itemized - as well as insurance premiums). All the specific items making up each of the two components of the finance charge would also be itemized.

There would be a specific, and limited exception for third party charges imposed by a settlement agent, the total of which could not exceed $100, and over which the lender has no control and no reasonable way of knowing the amount of the charge. Concerns that lenders express regarding their inability to know the charges that would be imposed by settlement agents would thus be alleviated. At the same time, consumers would be protected from abusive attempts to hide lender charges within the third party exception.

In lieu of the RESPA disclosures currently required, lenders could provide their good faith estimates of the total and the itemization of the finance charge as well as the amount financed. In addition, they would disclose other charges to be paid outside of closing. In this way the lenders are preparing, and consumer are receiving, all disclosures related to the transactions in the same format, and using the same language.

This proposal would benefit lenders who try to keep their settlement and closing costs down, because the annual percentage rates on their loans would reflect these cost savings. Consumers also would benefit from the new competitive environment created by including the settlement charges in the annual percentage. Rate comparisons between lenders would, for the first time, truly reflect all of the costs of credit with the particular lender.

Case Histories Regarding the Importance of Various Measures
Proposed to be Changed by S. 650

Mrs. T.
The Right of Rescission

This is the story of a 77 year old African American woman from North Carolina, referred to here as Mrs. T, who is about to lose her home due to a series of abusive home loans. Her problems began when she signed a contract with a now defunct home repair company for a new roof and some windows (for over $13,000). After a series of four refinancings, she is now obligated on a loan, secured by her home, for over $32,000.

This elderly homeowner subsists on a monthly $722 Social Security check, which is occasionally supplemented by her work as a nursing assistant for other elderly people. The payments on her current mortgage - to Ford Consumer Finance - are $455.75 a month. Although it is hard to imagine how this woman is able to live on the remaining $266 a month, she has been able to make most of the payments under the loan. Regardless of how hard she tries to make the payments for the seven year term of the note, however, she will never be able to make the last one - which is a balloon payment of $32,411. This means that, for 6 years and 11 months, Mrs. T.'s monthly payments are $455.75; the very last monthly payment is $32,411.08. The total of these payments is $70,238.33.

Mrs. T. was induced to refinance the original loan four times in less than four years. After the original loan for her new $13,000 roof (although the house is less than 1000 square feet), and a few other extensions of credit along the way, Mrs. T. has received from the loan companies just under $23,000. Since this nightmare began, Mrs. T. has repaid the loan companies almost $18,000. Yet, today she still owes over $32,000. Despite her payments, the debts keeps rising because each time there was a refinancing, large prepaid finance charges and large settlement fees were added to the amounts owed.

Mrs. T. is about to lose the home that has been in her family for generations, despite her best efforts to maintain it, and pay the loans secured by it. North Carolina law, like the law of most states, allows lenders to charge whatever they want on loans like these extended to Mrs. T. She is using the one remedy that is available - Truth in Lending rescission - to try to save the home. In addition to taking advantage of Mrs. T. these lenders violated some of the disclosure requirements of the Truth in Lending Act. Although there is a clear pattern of abuse, because of the deregulation of interest rates and terms, no other state or federal law appears to have been clearly violated in this case. Truth in Lending rescission is the one law which may enable Mrs. T. to keep her home.

Congressional efforts to deal with abusive home lending in the 103rd Congress were helpful. But it should be noted, that not one of the loans extended to Mrs. T. would have been covered by the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act of 1994.
Mrs. R.
The Right of Rescission

Mrs. R., a 67-year old Washington, D.C. resident went to Lender G who advertises on the radio: "$50 million to lend!" She contacted them about a consolidation loan: $9600, mostly unsecured debt.

Their representative came to her house, collected her bills and took them back. Three days later, they came out to her house again, picked her up and drove her to their office to sign some papers. These papers purported to be a 16% loan -- secured, of course, by her home.

What she didn't realize -- until 4 years later -- was that Lender G was not the lender. It was a broker, acting for a national bank.

The loan was for significantly more than $9600. There was a nearly $4,500 brokers fee, $250 for an appraisal that never took place, $440 of other closing costs. And, oh. There was a $6765 charge. Unbeknownst to her, this was a premium for a $40,000 term life insurance policy. Both the lender and the broker profit from this insurance (a commission for one, and the lender gets an extra $10,900+ in interest on this loan from it.) Mrs. R., (or rather her children) can never possibly benefit from it, as the lender and broker knew. It requires the insured to be working, and, as her application made clear, she was retired at the time.

This $28,000 loan -- of which only $9600 was actual consideration for her benefit -- had her paying over $400 a month until she is 77 years old.

This loan -- from a national bank -- disclosed as a 16% loan -- is really a 29+% loan. One fully secured by her home.

Had Congress not preempted D.C.'s usury ceiling for first liens, this loan would have been usurious. As it is, Mrs. R. can use TIL rescission to stop the foreclosure sale scheduled on her home.

If Congress now curtails her rescission right, too, what will older homeowners like Mrs. R. do when the foreclosure auction comes?
Ms. M
The Right of Rescission As a Defense

Ms. M. is an 84 year old Maryland resident taking care of three young great grandchildren. She recently faced a foreclosure proceeding on her home after falling behind on her mortgage payments. Her only source of income was social security and AFDC.

Ms. M. fell behind on her mortgage payments because her Social Security check had been stolen in the same month as she had provided her small savings to a family who was in even worse shape than hers. The mortgage she fell behind on secured a loan for $11,000 at a 20% annual interest rate. It was a first mortgage, not used to purchase her home. Settlement charges on the loan totalled approximately $3,400, over 30% of the loan amount.

After the lender moved to foreclose, Ms. raised her rescission rights as a defense, although the statute of limitations on rescission had expired. At the hearing on the temporary restraining order, the creditor agreed to stop the sale. Later the creditor settled by voiding the mortgage, eliminating the debt, dismissing the foreclosure, and paying some attorney's fees. Ms. M. would have lost her house and become homeless with her three great grandchildren but for the protections provided by the Truth in Lending Act.

If S. 650 passes, this elderly woman would have had no remedy because rescission by recoupment would be barred.
Mr. and Mrs. B
Assignee Liability

A married couple with two children who live in Maryland were sold home improvements by a door-to-door salesman. They could not afford to pay cash and the salesman assured them that he could get them financing. They specifically stated that they did not want a second mortgage on their house because their eldest daughter has Lupus and they would need to get a line of credit on their home to pay medical bills not covered by insurance. They were assured there would be no mortgage on the house. The salesman came back with a number of papers to sign and refused to give them copies. They were told to sign in various spots and the papers were stacked on top of each other. This salesman also told them there was no mortgage. Many of the papers were not yet filled in. Those that were dated had the date of the salesman's first visit which was a couple of weeks before the signing of the papers. Thus, the couple never had an opportunity to cancel. For work valued at approximately $4,000, the homeowners owed over $11,000 given the length of the loan and an interest rate of 15%. The contractor had an arrangement with a lender to immediately buy the loan from the contractor. The couple's daughter did need intensive medical care and ultimately died from complications due to Lupus. They discovered the existence of the second mortgage only after they applied for and were denied an equity line of credit because they already had a second mortgage.

If S. 650 passed this family would have lost their home because they could not have raised legitimate claims to void the loan against the holder - the assignee - of the their mortgage.
